

New Brunswick

Here's another misunderstood province: New Brunswick.

Again, westerners are deceived. When they see it on the map, they think it's small.

No, it is huge. Too huge to explore in one trip – although that's pretty much what we did.

Took two weeks, and it was a hell of a lot of driving. Think of it this way: distance across New Brunswick from St. Andrews to Campbellton is 455 kilometers. Similarly, distance from Falcon Lake, Manitoba to Virden, Manitoba is 460 kilometers.

That's the same distance across the populated parts of those provinces. Except that only accounts for the left side of New Brunswick. It's a square. Multiply the driving by four. On a map, Manitoba is only populated across the bottom. That big space on the map of Manitoba is in the north, and largely empty. The empty part of New Brunswick is in the middle.

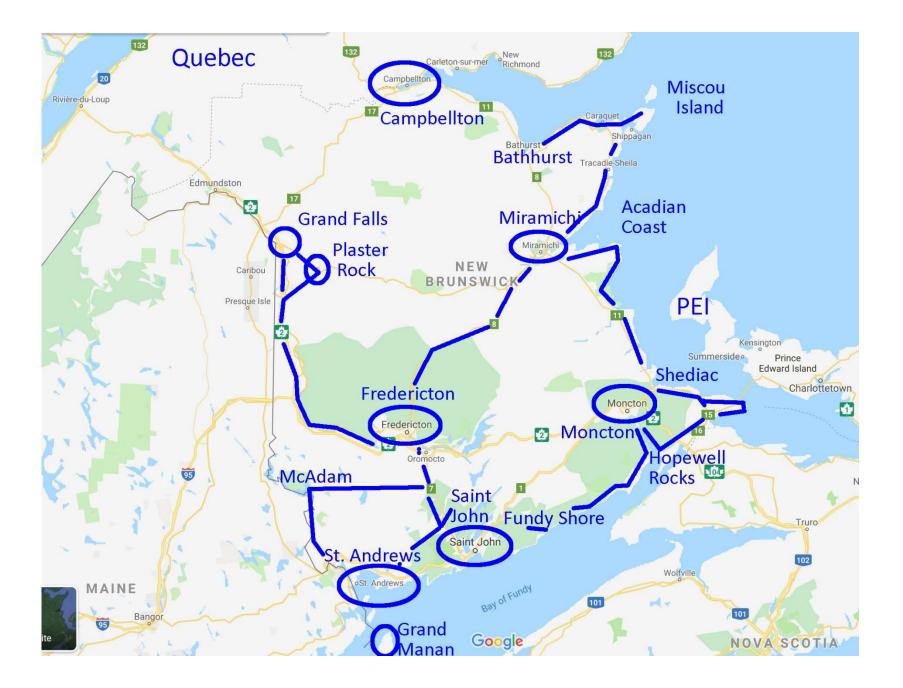

These two provinces have a lot in common. Most people drive thru them en route to somewhere else. These two provinces are the only ones in Canada that are bilingual. The populations are largely working class, if they'll admit it, and some of the towns are a little of what they used to call "hard scrabble". And the people are down to earth and engaging.

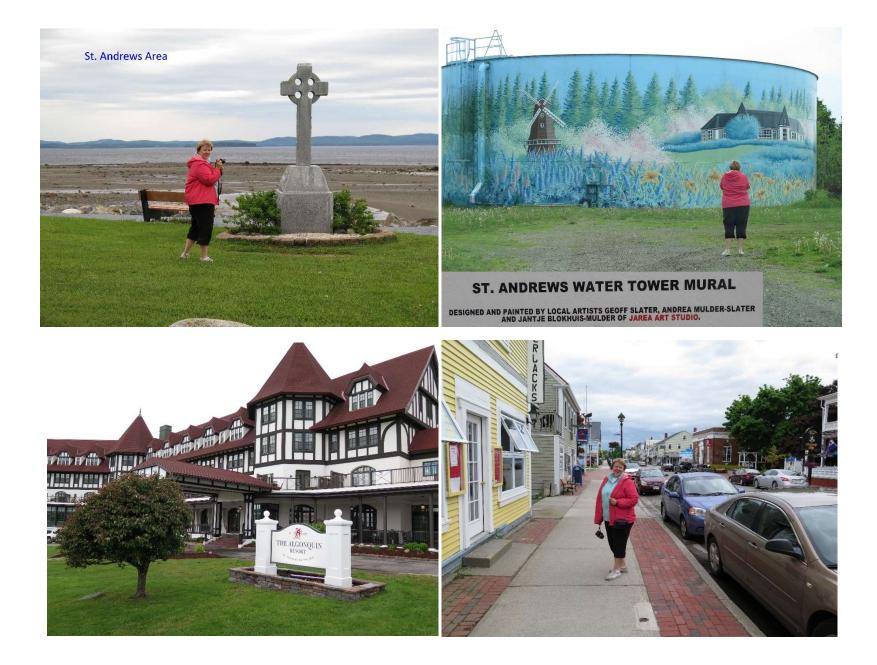

New Brunswick is truly bilingual. The English have the southwest, with Saint John as their urban center, and the Fundy Shore as their rural roots. The French have the northeast, with Moncton as their center, and the Atlantic Coast as their real roots. (It's not "French" as much as "Acadian".)

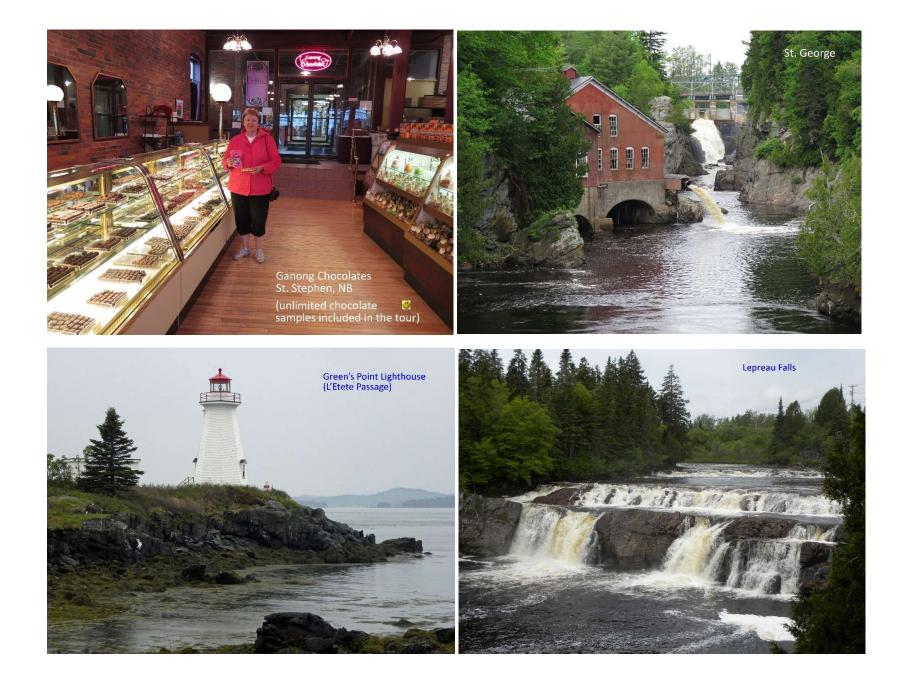

The Acadians have their own language, which is neither French nor English, but a blend of its own, with a rather unique and interesting history. They proudly fly their own flag (everywhere) to proclaim their heritage.

Oh yes, the other urban center is the government capital of Fredericton. Also a beautiful part of the Saint John River Valley.

Both these provinces are used to having yearly spring flooding too, so they should reach out and embrace each other; because they have even more in common than most provinces of this Canadian confederation.

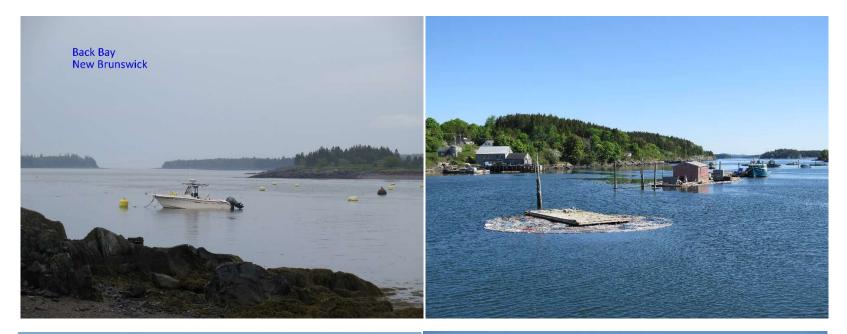

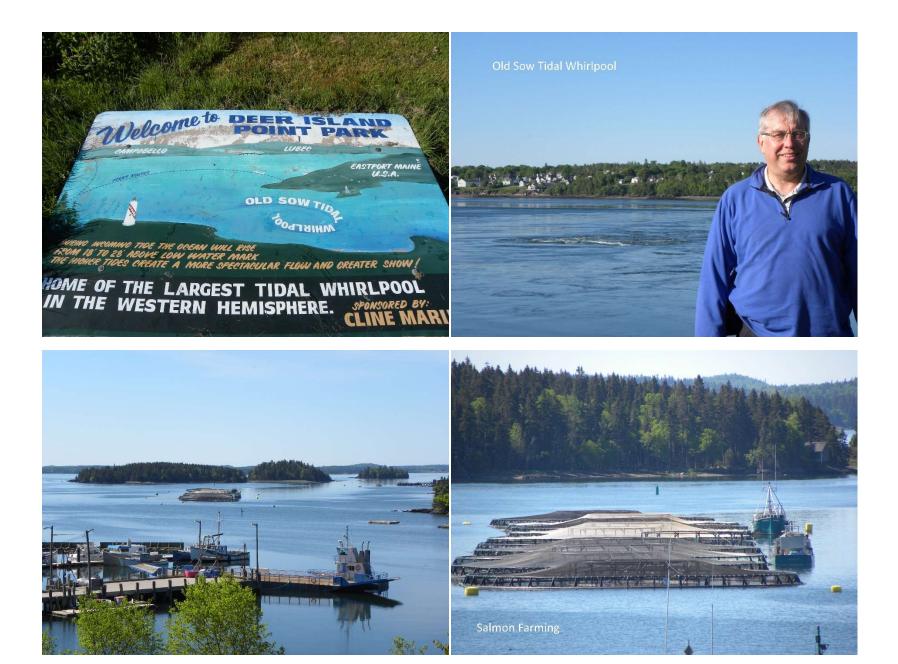

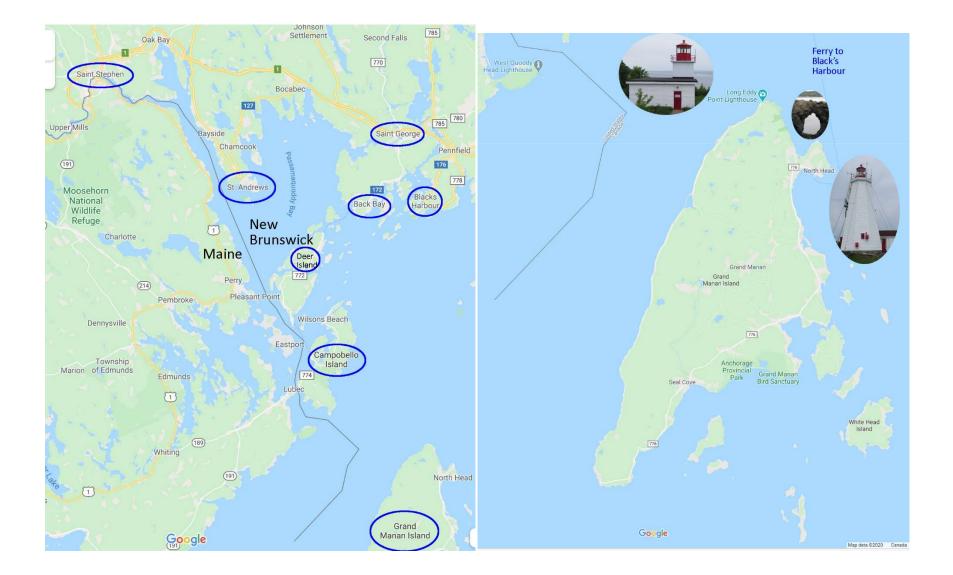

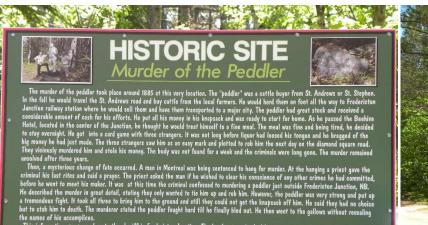

but to stab him to death. The murderer stated the pedaler tought hard till he finally bled out. He then went to the gallows without revealing the names of his accomplices. This information was passed on to the sheriff in Fredericton Junction. The local community had become very suspicioud of any stranger that pased through. Doors were locked and a great fear had taken over the village. The news that the murderer had finally been caught and hung eased tension in every household. The community has remained faithful in maintaining the unnamed peddler's grave and memory...it is new part of our history

OromoctoRiverWatershed

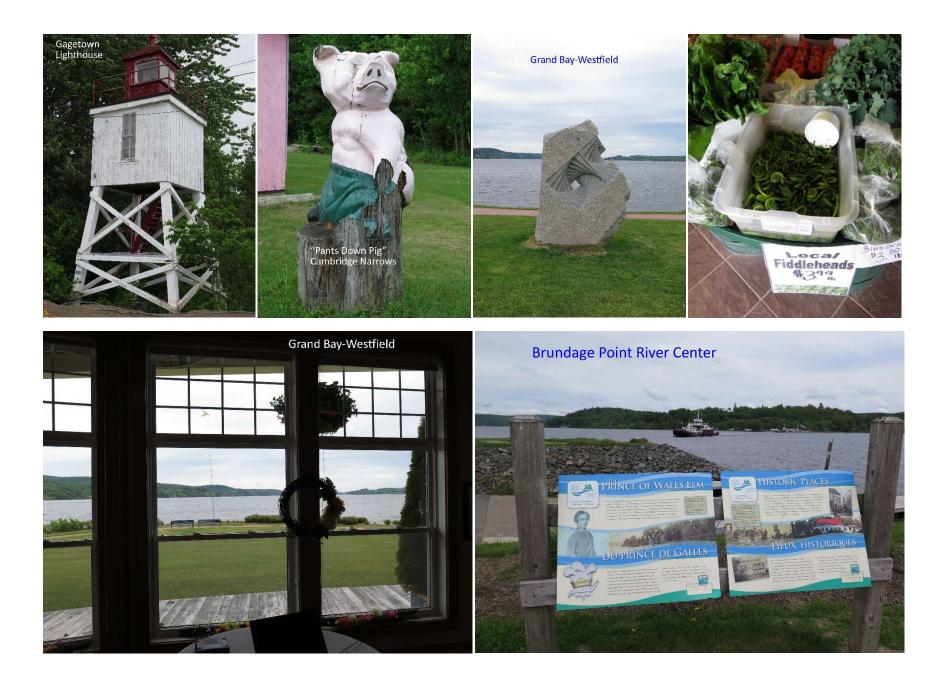

-102 B

N 45° 38.165 W 66° 38.155

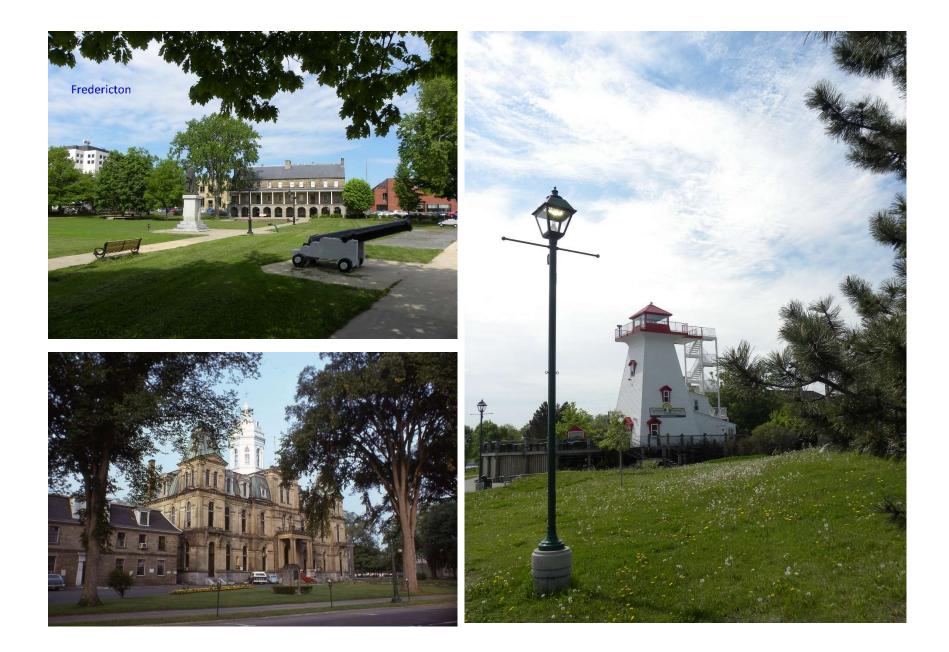

A PROPERTY OF THE REAL

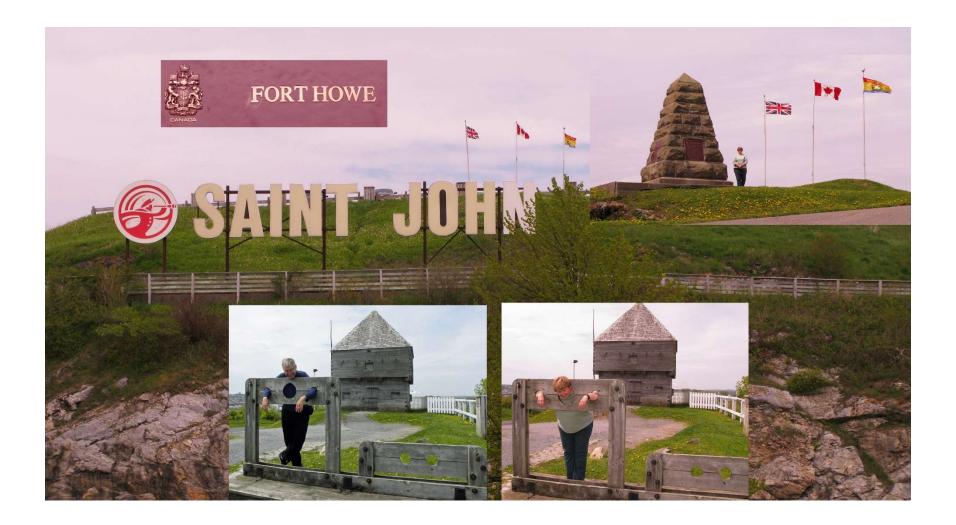

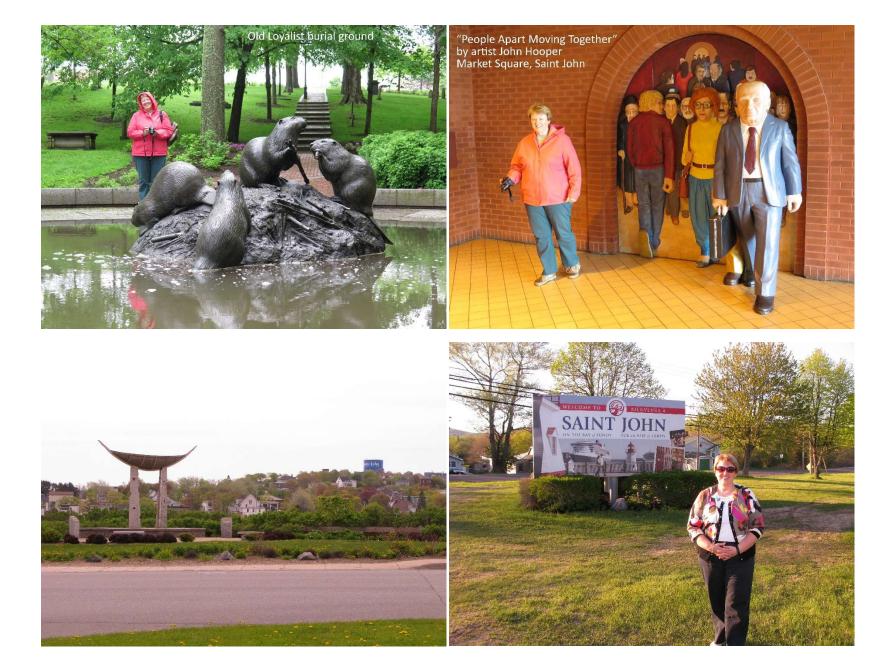

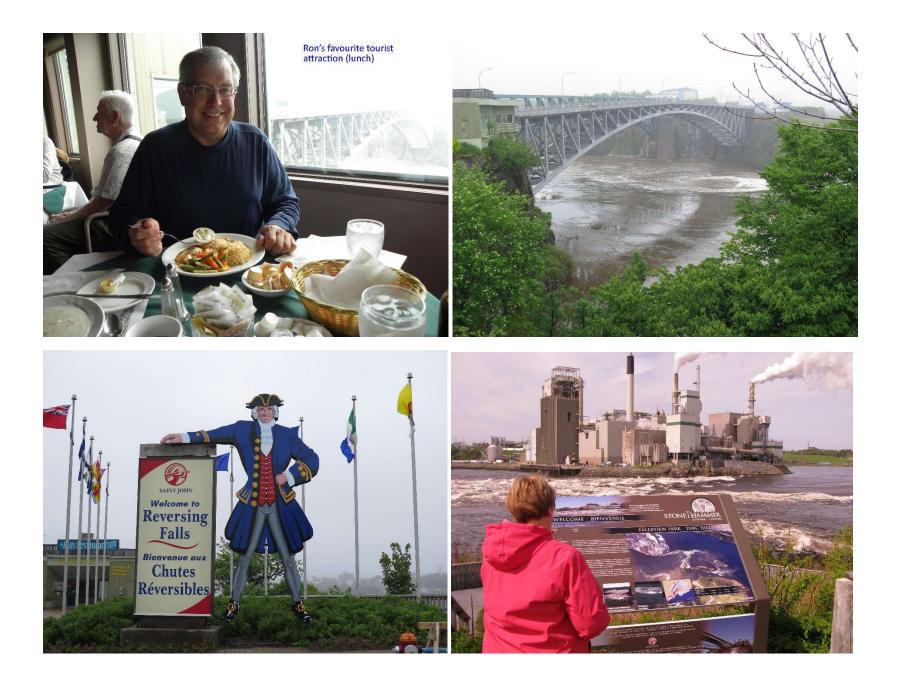

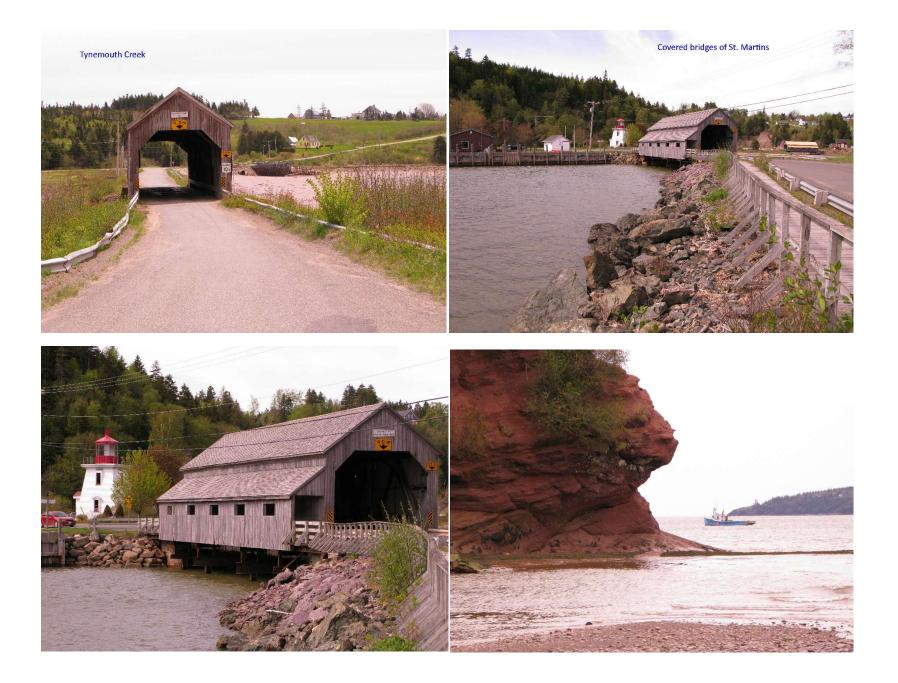

Reed's Point 3 Sisters Lamp is in direct line with Trinity Church - so that sea captains could navigate safely to Saint John Harbour at night - if all 3 lamps were visible, sailors were on course

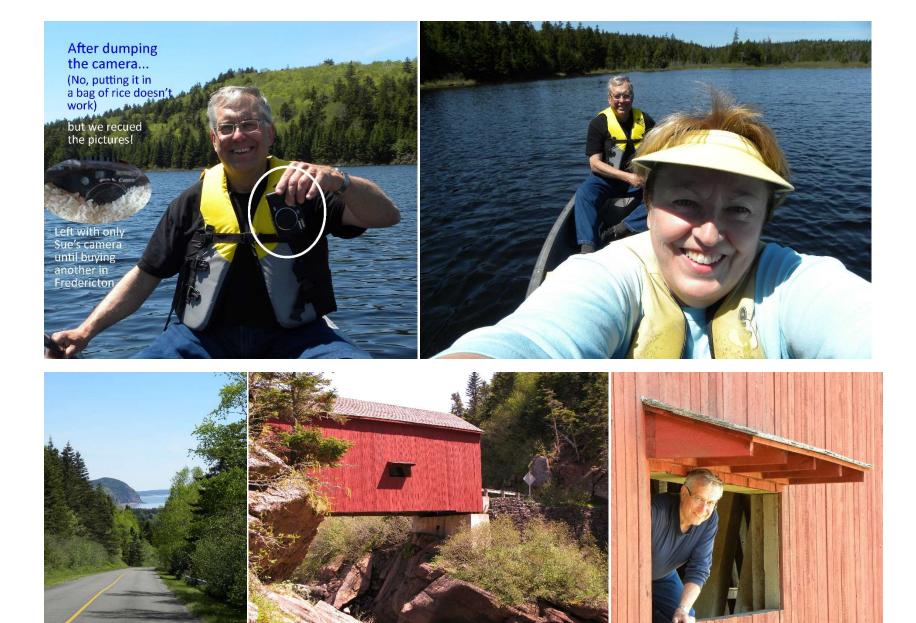

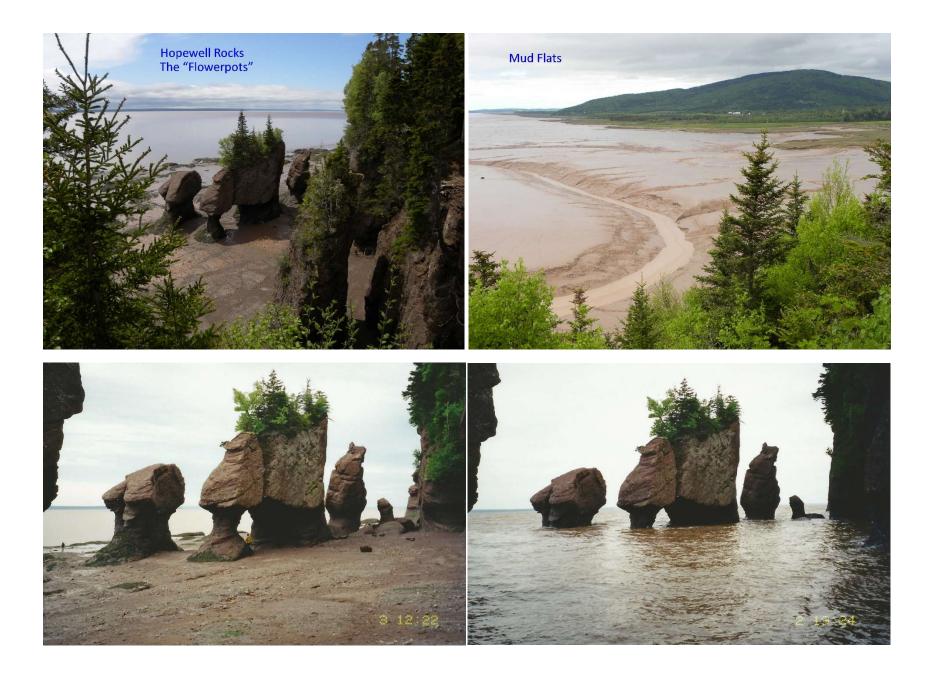

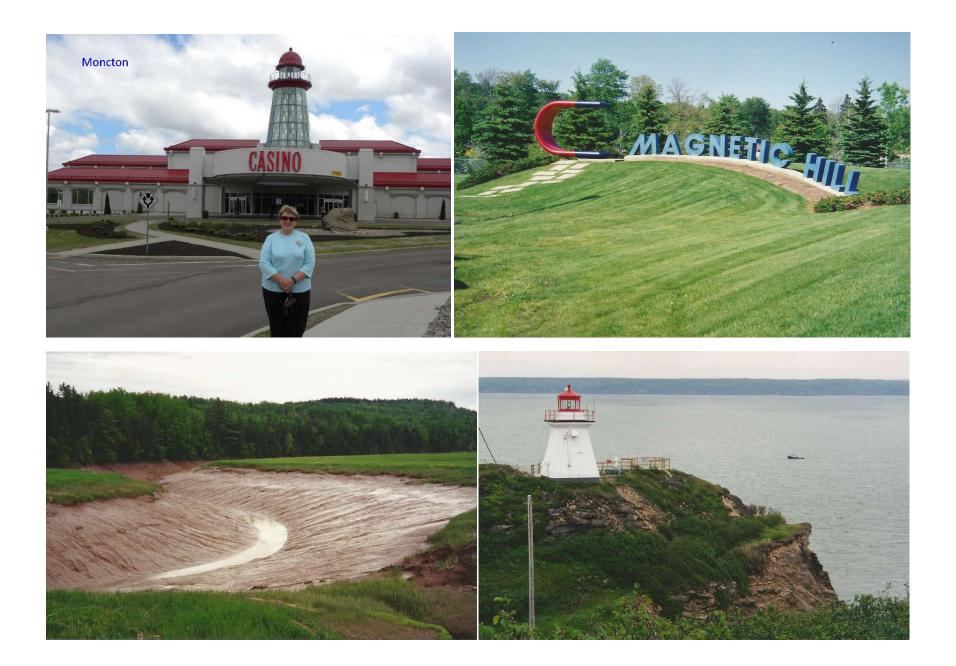

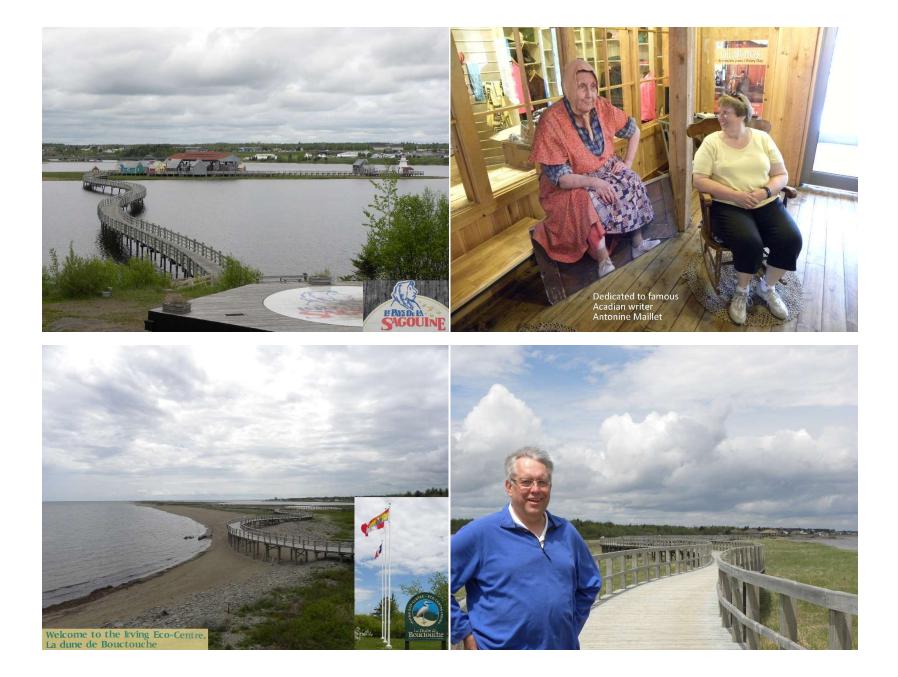

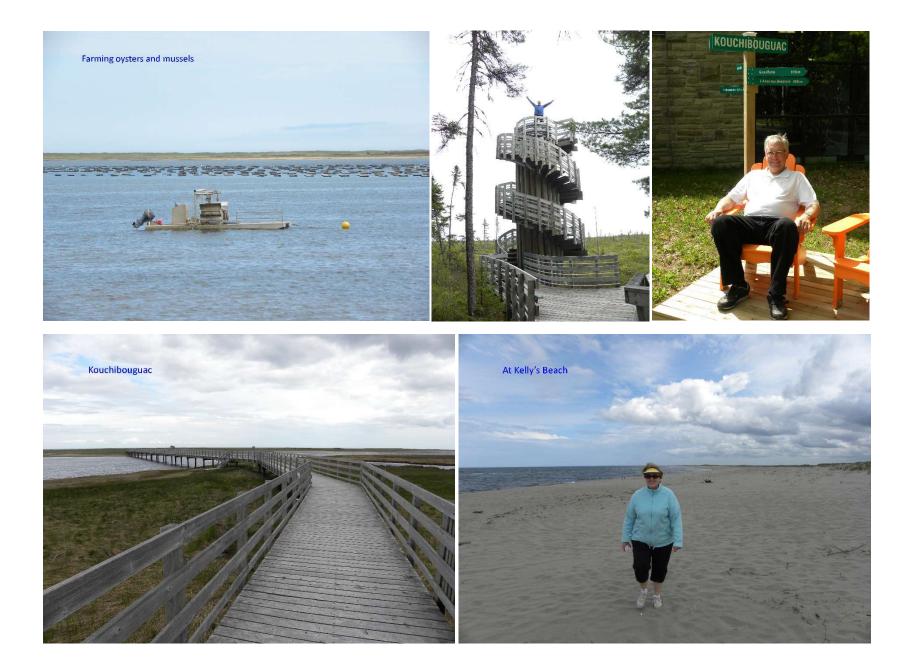

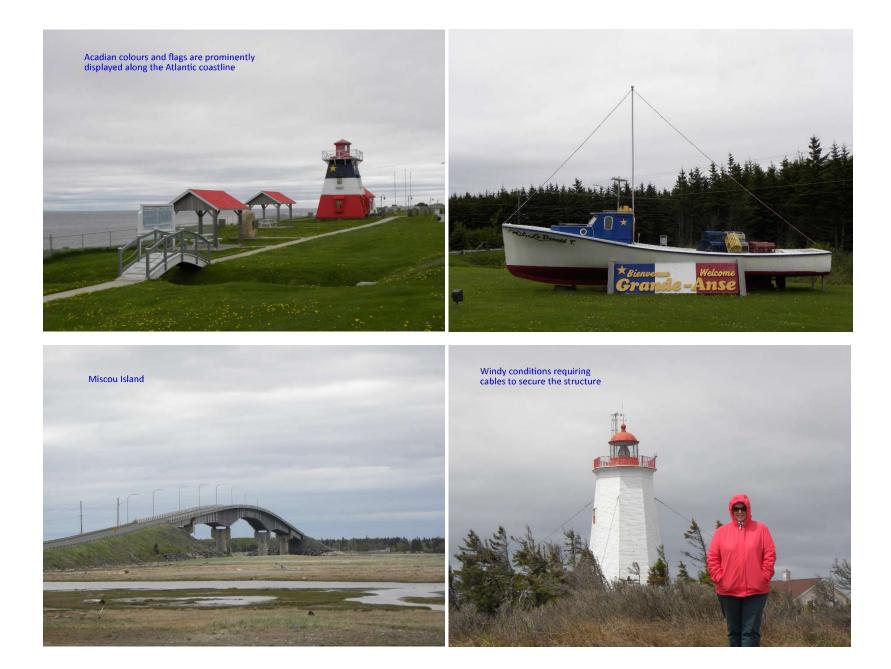

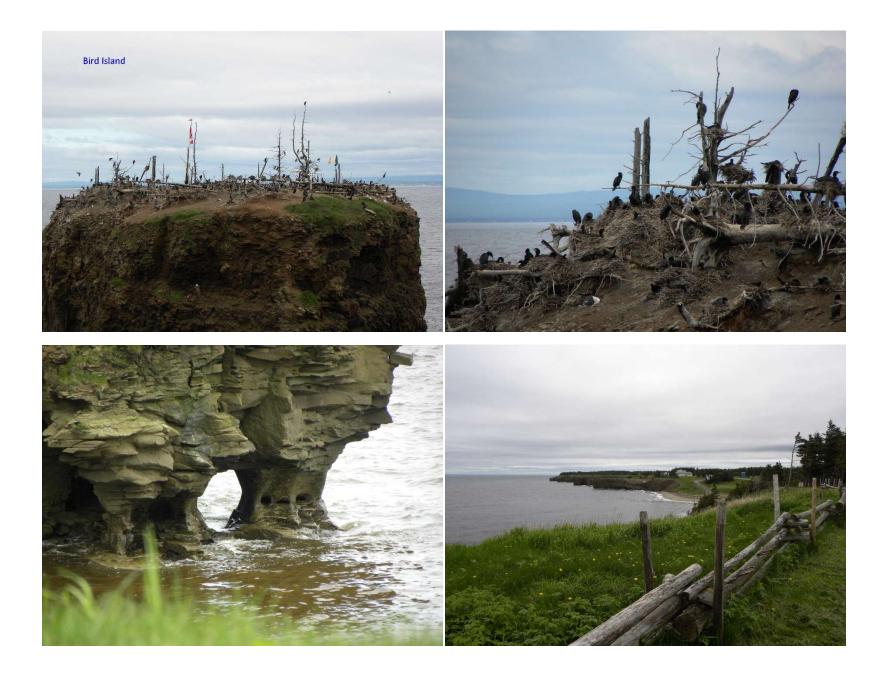

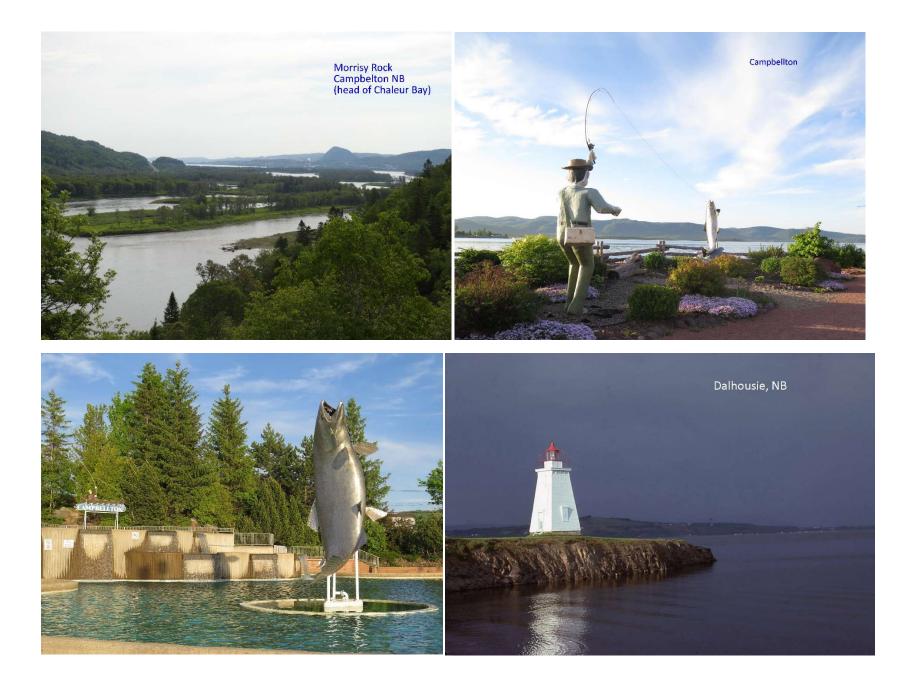

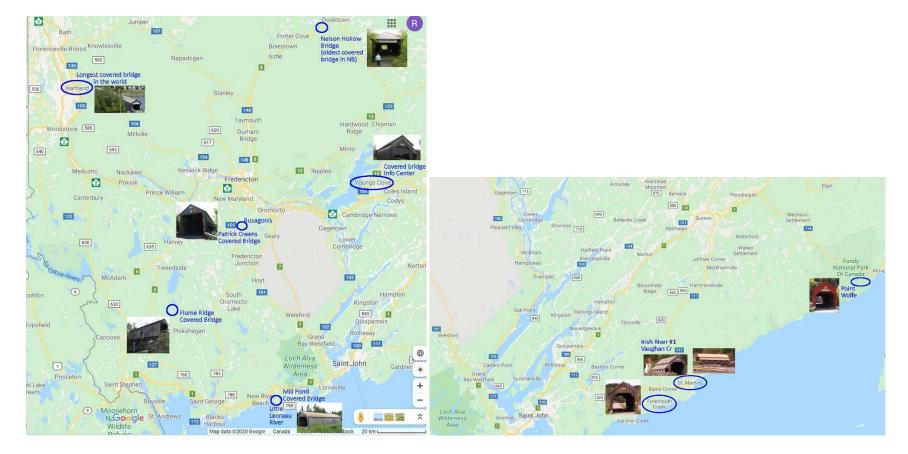

Covered Bridges we visited in New Brunswick

